

This trend makes sense, as higher file sizes will cost more transfer time because it takes longer to transfer all the bits in the file.

The transfer is limited by synchronous, one-chunk-at-a-time round-trips. The client sends one file chunk request, waits for the server to reply, then writes and repeats. That creates a lot of small request and response cycles, which takes time because they are synchronous.